The difficult problem for CIA Director Allen Dulles is to find a way to execute the retirement he had long planned without letting it appear that he is leaving as a victim of the Cuban invasion. Dulles had originally planned to retire at the end of the year but the imminent prospect of considerable change in the organization as a result of the appraisals of recent months is likely to make it more suitable for him to retire sooner and let a new man put the modifications into effect. Dulles continues to enjoy the high confidence of the President.
